The LAST LAUGH

"Phooey!" grumbled Bugs Bunny. "How can ya find a word ya don't know how to spell, when ya don't know how to spell it to look it up?"

Bugs sat at his kitchen table with paper, pencil, eraser and dictionary. He was not playing author; he was struggling to write a letter. Every word in it had to be spelled correctly, and Bugs was using some pretty big words.

Take the word "neighborhood," for instance.

"I've looked through every word beginnin' with 'n-a' an' it ain't there," Bugs muttered.

He picked up the half-written letter to read the last sentence again. "You have been chosen to represent your na— wonder what other word I could use?"

He wrinkled his brow and thought and thought. Suddenly he opened his dictionary. "I know! I'll say 'in your versinity.' That sounds well."

Poor Bugs! He looked all through the "v-e-r-s" but "versinity" was not there either. "That Webster guy was sure one dumb bunny," he said disgustedly.

Then a new idea struck him. He hunted up a newspaper and hurriedly scanned the front page. " 'The weatherman says—' Nope, nothin' in that story! . . 'Police last night . . . in the NEIGHBORHOOD!' Aha! I—" He gulped and flushed. "Guess I'M the dumb bunny," he said embarrassedly.

Between the newspaper and the dictionary, Bugs finally finished the letter. He sealed it, wrote the address carefully and ran all the way to the post office.

Bright and early next morning, Bugs was on his way to Porky Pig's house. He whistled and grinned, and whistled and grinned all the way there.

"GOOD morning, chum!" cried Bugs cheerfully when Porky opened the front door. "What're ya doin'?"

"Eating my b-breakfast," answered Porky. "As if Y-YOU didn't know."

"Honest, Pork," Bugs declared. "Just this once, I didn't come here to eat."

"Then wh-what did you c-come for?" asked Porky as he and Bugs sat down at the table.

"Nothin' special," said Bugs, picking up Porky's piece of toast. "Just thought maybe we could cook up some excitement."

Porky slipped another piece of bread into the toaster. "G-Got any suggestions?" he asked.

Instead of answering, Bugs leaped to his feet. "What was that whistle?" he cried.

"Wh-Whistle?" frowned Porky. "I didn't hear any."

"I must be hearin' things." Bugs sat down again.

Bugs was on his third piece of toast and Porky was still trying to cook one for himself when they both heard the shrill sound of a whistle.

"Now don't tell me I'm hearin' things again," said Bugs.

"You're n-not," said Porky, eyeing Bugs puzzledly. "B-But it's only the p-postman. Nothing to g-get excited about." He headed for the front door.

When Porky returned, he was wide-eyed and waving an open letter. "G-Gee!" he exclaimed. "L-Look at this,

B-Bugs!"

Bugs looked—although he could have recited the letter from memory.

"Dear Sir:" it read. "You have been chosen to represent your neighborhood in a special demonstration of our Wonder-View Television set. All you have to do is let us install a set in your home for one week, invite your neighbors in to see the programs, and—if one of them orders a set from us, you will receive ABSOLUTELY FREE the demonstration set. No strings attached! Come in today. Do not delay! Very truly yours,

Wonder-View Television Co."

Porky was so excited, he forgot he hadn't finished his breakfast. "Let's g-go right d-down there!" he cried.

Bugs was agreeable but, when they reached the store, he told Porky he'd wait for him outside.

"Suit yourself," said Porky rushing into the store.

Bugs waited for five minutes. For ten minutes. What was keeping Porky? By now, he certainly should have discovered the joke. Bugs started for the door but at that moment, Porky came out. He looked odd, as if he were trying not to laugh.

"April Fool!" yelled Bugs.

"You th-think you're p-pretty smart, d-don't you?" said Porky. "Well, remember—he wh-who laughs last, laughs b-best." With that, Porky rushed off up the street, leaving Bugs open-mouthed.

"Now what did the little twerp mean by THAT?" he asked himself.

Late that afternoon—after a carrot raid on Elmer Fudd's garden—Bugs found a note from Porky under his door. "Come over to my house tonight," it said. "I'm having a television party."

Bugs roared with laughter. "Why the crazy, little chump!" he chortled. "Expectin' me to fall for an April Fool gag like that!"

He did not go to Porky's that night. But he casually dropped around there the next afternoon.

Porky was delighted to see him. "C-Come in, B-Bugs," he smiled.

"Yipe!" yelled Bugs when he reached the living room door. "A television set!"

Porky grinned. "A W-Wonder-View set. D-Didn't you see the aerial?"

Bugs shook his head. "I didn't look at the roof," he said. Then he scowled. "I don't get it. It was only a gag."

"Th-That's right," said Porky. "B-But the c-company liked it so well, they d-decided to use it for a p-promotion stunt. And I really D-DID have a television p-party last night. I made s-sandwiches and p-punch, and P-Petunia brought a c-cake."

Bugs gulped. "Oh, NO!"

"And," continued Porky beamingly, "th-that's not all. My n-neighbor, Mr. Bacon, ordered a s-set. S-So this one is M-MINE—FREE!"

Bugs sank into the nearest chair. "An' THIS li'l April Fool got nothin'," he groaned. "Not even the last laugh."

Hold me down!

Now to make a banjum with them...

Little Hugo wants to show you he can jump higher than YOU!

Haw! Haw! How foolish! If he could do THAT, we'd all go away!

Oops!

You would?

Sure! But we all know he can't! Heh, heh!

We'll see... Let him loose, Mary Jane!

Here I go!

It's a world's record for hamsters!

Yipe! It's a world's record for ALL hoppin'!

Lookat that guy hop!

O-o-oh! What awful style!

Yeah! And look! Something hopped out of his coat!

Run! It's a hoppin spook!

Thats what made him jump so high!

Spook, huh? I'll just break that thing to pieces!

See? It's nothin but a li'l old worm! We've been tricked!

Hey! Who turned the lights on!

Don't let 'em get away! They'll pay for this!

Help! Let me go!

Run, Mary Jane!

Oh, Sniffles! Those dreadful grass-hoppers!

Maybe we can save him, if your new shoes are still around!

Here they are, but what...

We'll each crawl into the toe of one, then start hopping back to Hugo!

And now, you meddler, I'm gonna...

Wait! Forget him! Look!

EEK! Spooks! This place IS haunted!

Yipe! Let's go find us a new hoppin' spot!

Outa m' way! We're NEVER comin' back here!

Goodness! Look at them go!

I guess this was too much for them!

Its too much for me, too!

Later...

Now, THIS is really livin'! It's going to make a new Hugo out of me!

I'm so glad my shoes helped save you!

Well, like I always tell bullies... if the SHOO fits, you better start runnng!

Oh, Sniffles! Jee, hee!
